The Shift

There was a moment, not a loud or grand moment, when I started to become aware of the life inside of other humans. Humans who until then I had only felt rage toward. Compassion had no room in my heart amidst all of the anger and hurt.. til the day I saw vulnerability in the eyes of someone who prior to this I'd only saw someone who wanted to hurt me. Figuring out that everyone is battling their own demons, intantly quieted mine.

5 PROMPTS TO CHOOSE COMPASSION

H

What story could this person be carrying that I can not see?

Will I miss this person if I burned this bridge right now?

If I could only say one sentence instead of the whole storm, what would I say?

Is this person's behavior even about me?

Think of the other person as a child, what hurt them to make them so toxic?

Your voice carries power. These affirmations help you use it with clarity, compassion, and strength.

● Choosing to not hurt someone today also keeps me from hating myself tomorrow

The way I speak to others becomes the way I live with myself

● Restraint is not a weakness, it is the strongest form of control

● I can not expect kindness from others if I myself am going to be cruel

● I do not sound like I am very peaceful when I am screaming "I hope you choke"

● Saying nothing, instead of lashing out,, helps me maintain my innocence in any situation

● I do not have time to waste on being ugly when I have so much beauty to give to the world.

Boundaries are not walls. They are clear lines that protect your energy and peace, while still allowing connection with others. Without them, resentment builds, and we end up betraying our values just to please other people.. With them, our relationships grow healthier because they are not confusing. Boundaries start with clarity. Ask yourself, "What do I need in order to feel safe, comfortable and true to my values"?

Say what you mean. Clearly.

→ State it simply. Unapologetically.

→ Stand behind your decision. Firmly, and with compassion.

→ Use calm, clear language. "I won't be answering calls after 9 p.m" You don't have to over-explain. That's all. Easy, right? Not Always.

Your boundaries will be tested. People will push back. Those people have no place in your space. End of discussion.

Boundaries release you of responsibility for other's actions, as they define what you will allow and what you will not allow. Setting healthy boundaries is not selfish, and it is not something someone else can take personally. Clarity is kind, and prevents setting anyone up for failure. When the rules are laid out for all to see, nobody gets to say they didn't know. And remember,

NO is a complete sentence.
